

Three Vital Tenets of a Successful Team

Business leaders must have a razor sharp understanding of how productive their teams are based on the results they are producing. Leaders are constantly asking themselves what is working and what is not working with regard to our systems and processes?

Three main principles facilitate improving goal-setting, making better decisions about the company's strategic direction and more effectively inspiring the best performance from their team members.

Clarity

Clarity starts with the team leader and permeates throughout the entire organization. Does everyone have a solid grasp of the team's goals? Ask your team members what are their goals with regard to completing a specific project. How are people performing relative to the achievement of those goals? Make sure you ask these questions frequently and consistently.

Alignment

Once everyone is clear on the goals, determine whether each goal is aligned or opposed to each other throughout departments and the business as a whole. Objectives can be misaligned depending on the desired outcome of each goal. For example, if sales goals surpass the production department's ability to fulfill the orders timely, customers will get frustrated and may go to a competitor.

Ability

Does the team have the talent it needs to complete its goals on time and on budget?

Team leaders should be strategically surrounding themselves with people who are strong in abilities they are not as proficient in. The best leaders encourage their team members to work alongside them in achieving high productivity, increased profitability and exceptional company growth.

Pacific Crest Group's posting "Know Where You are...Know Where You are Going" provides several ideas on the discipline required to lead a team in achieving its goals. It requires maintaining a certain mindset and consistently performing actions that create a culture where everyone feels empowered, inspired, productive and rewarded in fulfilling the most important and aligned objectives first.
